

David W. Andrews, Ph.D.

David W. Andrews, Ph.D. is a lifelong educator committed to equity and access through personalized student centric approaches. In June 2022, he was appointed to serve as the chancellor of the University of Massachusetts Global, a private nonprofit online university affiliated with the University of Massachusetts. Dr. Andrews also serves as president of the non-profit National Laboratory for Education Transformation (NLET). Before joining NLET he was the president of National University. During his five-year term as president, National University substantially improved retention and graduation rates, graduated its largest single class of over 6000 students, launched its first doctoral programs, nearly doubled its endowment/reserves to over $1B, and was reaccredited by WASC for the longest possible term of 10 years.

Dr. Andrews also served as the dean of the School of Education at Johns Hopkins University. During his tenure the School of Education established a reputation for quality that earned it U.S. News and World Report's #1 ranking of Graduate Schools of Education two years in a row. While at Johns Hopkins he led the design, build, and start of the first new public school (PK-8th Grade) in East Baltimore in over 25 years. Before his work at Johns Hopkins, Dr. Andrews led a merger that resulted in the creation of the College of Education and Human Ecology at The Ohio State University and was the new college's founding dean. His scholarly work has focused on intervening in the life course of high risk and difficult to serve students.

Dr. Andrews holds a bachelor's in Psychology from Auburn University, a master's degree from Kansas State University, and a Ph.D. from Florida State University.
