Scientific understanding of the environment is emphasized. The course gives an overview of major environmental problems and scientific principles, with a focus on managing environmental problems and important natural resources. The most important topics that will be covered include trends in energy use and generation (fossil fuels and alternatives), water and air pollution, weather, and climate (and the biosphere's response to climate). The homework will emphasize calculations assisting in a better understanding of quantitative models and the manipulation environmental data.

Course Learning Outcomes

By the end of this course, students should be able to:

1. Evaluate problems from an environmental and social scientific perspective.
2. Determine the connection between environmental science, sustainability and inequality.
3. Apply a critical lens to the study of environmental issues across different geographies.
4. Explore the role of spatial analysis in evaluating global environmental issues.
5. Evaluate the role that decision-making plays in achieving sustainable environments.
